Pain, which is the feeling of our finiteness, is not a fixture in our life. It is not an end in self, as joy is. To meet with it is to know that it has no part in the true permanence of creation. It is what error is in our intellectual life. To go through the history of the development of Science is to go through the maze of mistakes it made current at different times. Yet no one really believes that Science is the one perfect mode of disseminating mistakes. The progressive ascertainment of truth is the important thing to remember in the history of Science, not its innumerable mistakes. Error, by its nature, cannot be stationary; it cannot remain with truth; like a tramp, it must quit its lodging as soon as it fails to pay its score to the full.
